A message from the King's Cross CEO

After 20 years developing and transforming King's Cross, we are delighted to unveil Capella – our last major collection of new homes, within central London's most extraordinary neighbourhood.

King's Cross has fast become one of Europe's most compelling and dynamic destinations. Formerly a powerhouse of London's industrial and engineering past, King's Cross is now the epicentre of its most creative talent. This is where you will find media, tech, fashion and advertising, world-class teaching, inspiring designers and leading companies. The University of the Arts London Central Saint Martins, the Aga Khan University, Google, Facebook, Havas, Sony Music and Nike are all here, with the Francis Crick Institute and British Library just around the corner.

The neighbourhood also boasts an eclectic range of shops, cafés, bars and restaurants, two schools, sport, leisure and community facilities. Bold new architecture complements powerful historic buildings, all set around exceptional public squares, parks and gardens. Granary Square, Pancras Square and Coal Drops Yard, in particular, anchor an evolving design district, a distinctive blend of global and independent retailers and growing food scene.

This is the best-connected location in the capital, with 6 Underground lines, Thameslink, main line and international connections, the latter via Eurostar and St Pancras International. Each day we welcome a mixture of students, workers, residents, shoppers, visitors and tourists. They are all attracted to our traffic-free oasis in the heart of London, its rich character and compelling authenticity.

Capella offers you the opportunity to become part of this. Our thoughtfully designed, modern apartments offer an unrivalled location and unique way of life, with the very best of King's Cross on your doorstep.

It's an incredible story. Now you have a chance to make a home here – and help write the last chapter.

Yours sincerely,
Robert Evans
Joint Managing Partner, Argent and CEO, the King's Cross Estate

King's Cross – history reinvented

The transformation of King's Cross is almost complete. A place that was once closed off, disused and forgotten has been reinvented and reimagined. King's Cross is now open – full of people, businesses and creativity.

The energy and enterprise of its industrial past lives on. It's now home to Facebook, Google and Nike, as well as entertainment giants Universal Music and Sony. St Pancras International connects London to the world. Since 2012, 41 million people have explored this dynamic, vibrant destination.

“In case you hadn't noticed, King's Cross is having a major moment.”
Zak Maoui, GO

Here's how we got there.

A DIFFERENT TIME

By the 1990s, a once vital Victorian industrial hub is in decline. Underused, disused or derelict. A lost, forgotten 'railway land'.

THE FIRST BRICKS ARE LAID

Over 2007 and 2008, early infrastructure work and development begins across the area – focused on the Victorian buildings that once formed the Goods Yard.

GRANARY SQUARE

Originally where Victorian barges unloaded their cargo, Granary Square was closed off for years. It's now the hub of King's Cross. The goods and wares are back, in world-class restaurants and shops, in a beautifully open space, where vibrant fountains flow – and London comes together.

OLD STRUCTURES RE-ENERGISED

145 distinctive canal-side apartments and penthouses are built within a refurbished triplet of grade 2 listed, cast iron gas holder frames at the heart of King's Cross.

A CANOPY MARKET

Once a busy goods distribution hub, after rail traffic stopped in the 1970s, the West Handyside Canopy lapsed into occasional use, for deliveries and parking. Restored and revitalised, it now covers Canopy Market, a bustling weekend market for artisan produce, street food traders, craft, art, designers and makers.

A WONDERFUL DESTINATION

We've come a long way. From the fading 'railway lands', to a thriving 67-acre site, with capacity for 18,000 jobs, supporting an on-site annual GVA capacity of 1.42bn. An incredible journey, across housing, commerce, transport, architecture and creativity. A journey that has transformed King's Cross from somewhere lost into a place where you'll always find something new.

NEW JOURNEYS BEGIN

In July 2000, work starts on the Channel Tunnel Rail Link and the extension of St Pancras Station. The international terminal opens in 2007. £2.5 billion is invested in transport infrastructure.

NEW SPACE FOR EVERYONE

The first building and public space opens at the King's Cross Estate in 2011.

CREATIVITY BLOOMS

In 2011, the University of the Arts, London moves to the Granary Complex. Today, The Granary Building is the stunning new home of the world renown art college, Central Saint Martins.

COAL DROPS YARD

In the 1990s and 2000s its dramatic, cavernous spaces housed film productions, counter-culture artists and underground dance music. It's now home to over 50 stores, galleries and restaurants – with the Victorian architecture preserved in bold contemporary design.

FROM DISUSE TO DESIGN

The imposing Fish and Coal Buildings, Victorian offices dating from 1851, have now been restored – as the canal-side home of British designer Tom Dixon. An elevated park, Bagley Walk (similar to New York's Highline) passes the restaurants, shops and offices in front of the building.

FROM COMBUSTIBLE TO SUSTAINABLE

King's Cross once distributed the coal that powered Victorian industry. Today it's very different to those carbon heavy times. Sustainability is at its heart. Over 40% of its open space is pedestrianised. It houses a sophisticated on-site energy centre, powered by 'green gas'. In 2021 the Estate became carbon neutral.

“In the past ten years, it has completely transformed into not only a key office district for London, but a thriving residential neighbourhood.”

Sadiq Khan, Mayor of London

King's Cross. A vibrant creative neighbourhood, where the best of food, design, culture and fashion meet on your doorstep.

Home to the Coal Drops Yard shopping and dining district, world-class brands with over 50 shops and restaurants. Living on the doorstep of a bustling community, there's something new to discover around every corner.
