About The Property

This five-bedroom house with a very versatile annexe/overflow accommodation, tucked into the centre of the heart of Newport, Pembrokeshire, combines everyday practicality with rare scope a home with commercial opportunities (subject to the necessary contents) or multi-generational living, all just a short walk from the coastline and local amenities in this vibrant village.

Set in a central spot on Market Street in the sought-after town of Newport, this character property offers a mix of original features, generous proportions and flexible options for how the space is used. It's a house with history, and for those with an eye for opportunity, it offers more than just a place to live. Whether it's a home for a growing family, a dual-living arrangement, or something more income-focused like a holiday let or business premises, this one has the scope to suit.

The main house stretches over two floors. At the front, two bay-windowed rooms mirror each other—currently used as a lounge and a dining area—with exposed beams adding a warm, traditional feel. Light filters through the bay windows, softening the atmosphere and giving these rooms a calm, grounded look. They could be left as they are, or used differently depending on what's needed.

Beyond these rooms lies the kitchen, which runs along the back of the house and looks out over the garden. There's a Rayburn tucked into one side, along with a mix of wall and base units and enough space for a dining table in the centre. A small rise in floor level leads to a snug that could easily be used as another sitting area, reading nook or casual space for kids. Next to this, a practical utility room connects to a wet room and also provides access into the annexe.

Offers in the region of £560,000

Continued; Upstairs, the main house has four double bedrooms and a smaller room which could be used as a study or office, craft space, or just for storage. Built-in wardrobes have been added to three of the bedrooms, making good use of the space without taking up floor area. The bathroom on this level is a good size, with space for a family to use without feeling cramped.

The annexe is accessed from the side of the property or through the main house via the utility room, depending on how it's set up. This part of the property has a straightforward layout, making it ideal for anyone needing separate accommodation. There's a hallway leading to a kitchen, a good-sized living/dining room, a double bedroom, a shower room, and a storage space. A porch at the back opens directly into the garden, keeping the outdoor space easily accessible.

What makes this property stand out is how it blends indoor and outdoor life. The garden isn't overly complicated or high-maintenance, but it has clear areas for different uses. Directly outside the kitchen and annexe porch is a paved area, framed with raised beds that bring colour and life through the seasons. From there, steps rise to a lawn surrounded by shrubs and bordered by a wooden fence. A gravel path splits the space again, leading to another paved section and a block-built shed—great for storing garden tools or outdoor furniture. There's room at the end for a vegetable plot for anyone who enjoys growing a few things at home.

At the front, there's a small patio seating area and a parking space for one car, which is useful given the central location.

Market Street puts the town on the doorstep—shops, cafés, restaurants and local services are all within walking distance, meaning day-to-day life here is straightforward and convenient.

Newport is one of those places that brings people back time and again. The two beaches—Traeth Mawr and The Parrog—offer contrasting settings, with the estuary in between home to wildlife and birdlife throughout the year. Carningli Mountain rises behind the town, adding another dimension for walkers and those who enjoy the outdoors. But it’s not just about the scenery. Newport has a strong sense of place, with local businesses, a primary school, pubs and restaurants that give it a year-round liveliness that’s hard to find in many coastal towns.

Back at the property, the scope it offers is clear. The annexe works well as guest accommodation or for anyone who needs privacy while staying connected to the main house. It could also be used as a long-term let, a holiday rental or even a work-from-home base, depending on what’s needed. Meanwhile, the main house itself offers space for family life without sacrificing character, and the layout means the different zones all serve a purpose.

There’s further potential too. The property has previously been used as a restaurant, and given the frontage onto Market Street, there could be scope for some kind of commercial venture again—subject to any necessary permissions. That’s something that won’t appeal to everyone, but for those who do want to blend work and home life, it’s an option worth considering.

This isn’t a home that needs explaining. It speaks through its materials, layout, and location. Solid, adaptable, and right at the centre of a town that balances coast, countryside and community.
