turning the Tapestry of the past..

This historic property, dating back to approximately 1906–1910 and designed by the renowned architects W. and E. Hunt, holds a distinctive place in London’s architectural heritage. Crafted from Portland stone with a slate roof, it showcases a bold neo-Greek design that was notably avant-garde for its time.

THE BUILDING NEWS, AUGUST 9, 1912.

GROUND FLOOR HALL, XCIII, MORTIMER STREET, W.—Messrs. WILLIAM and EDWARD HUNT, Architects.

93 Mortimer Street boasts a rich and diverse past that weaves together the tapestry of London’s architectural and cultural heritage. Its story begins in the late 18th century when it was one of a pair, the counterpart being located at 101 Great Portland Street. These two houses served as elegant end pavilions, adding charm to the block nestled between Great Portland Street and the former Edward Street.

THE LANGHAM ESTATE

The building comprises multiple office floors, an impressive grand hall, two entrances, and a freshly restored dome that floods the space with abundant natural light. Its facade is adorned with five bays and an impressive entrance. Flanking the central entrance are shop windows, adorned with fret-ornamented bands at impost level and embellished with scrolls at the key blocks of the arcade.

The upper floors feature architraved metal casements, framed by a giant Ionic order that rises from the podium. Wreaths adorn the columns and enriched cornices grace the windows, with an open cartouche pediment crowning the central window.

Notably, No. 43 Great Portland Street boasts a stone facade of similar character, albeit somewhat simpler in its design.

In the early 19th century, 93 Mortimer Street was a residence with a prestigious occupant, Sir Robert Bateson Harvey, hailing from Langley Park, Sussex. Following his tenure, it became the abode of several accomplished medical practitioners when in 1861 when Harry Lobb, renowned for his innovations in 'electric garments for medical purposes,' established the London Galvanic Hospital on these premises. The hospital closed its doors in 1869.

Subsequently, 93 Mortimer Street embraced a new role as the inaugural home of the German Athenæum (Deutscher Verein für Kunst und Wissenschaft). This institution served as a unique nexus, often described as a 'sort of sublime public house,' where German artists, musicians, and businessmen congregated. Notably, from 1875 onward, the Athenæum hosted captivating exhibitions of paintings and sculptures, further enhancing its cultural significance. The club's dynamic program also featured an array of captivating musical performances, enriching the cultural landscape of the neighbourhood.

In more recent times, this historic property found itself as the former headquarters of Wella, adding a modern chapter to its storied past.
