BELGRAVE SQUARE GARDENS

A tennis court, a secure children's play area, formal lawns and a rose garden — the private amenities of Belgrave Square Gardens are, by any measure, exceptional. Maintained by the Grosvenor Estate and held exclusively for residents, this four-acre garden square is accessible to keyholders alone, with no public access and with little commercial activity. In a neighbourhood where space is the ultimate luxury, it is a remarkable addition to daily life — and one of those advantages that simply comes with the address.

CHAPEL STREET

The street remains one of Belgravia's most coveted addresses — perfectly positioned amidst world-renowned designer boutiques, high-end restaurants, and iconic department stores, with residents on the Grosvenor Estate enjoying exclusive access to the immaculate private gardens and tennis courts of Belgrave Square. Its combination of early 19th-century architecture, a rich roll-call of former residents, and an unbeatable central London location ensure that Chapel Street retains its reputation as one of the capital's finest residential streets.

CHAPEL STREET'S FAMOUS RESIDENTS

Chapel Street has attracted some remarkable names over the years. No. 24 was home to Brian Epstein, manager of the Beatles, who moved there in January 1965. The house hosted numerous parties, including the Sgt. Pepper's Lonely Hearts Club Band album release party, and it was here that Epstein died on 27 August 1967. In the political sphere, Gerald Grosvenor, 6th Duke of Westminster, gave a house in the street to Norman Tebbit and his wife following the Brighton bombing in 1984. Michael Heseltine lived at No. 30 for many years, and it was from the steps of that house that he announced his challenge to Margaret Thatcher for the leadership of the Conservative Party.
