There is something rather special about arriving at The Linhay. Its private gravel drive sweeps between neighbouring paddock and established apple orchards, beneath a line of mature trees, before the house gradually comes into view. Converted by the current owners around five years ago and offered for sale for the first time since, this is far more than simply a well-finished barn conversion. The architecture, setting and gardens have all been considered together, retaining the character of the original building while creating a wonderfully light and comfortable home. The Linhay sits in the small rural hamlet of Stockleigh English, with its pretty church nearby, while Cheriton Fitzpaine is within walking distance and has a popular pub, community shop, modern primary school and doctors' surgery, with a bus service for secondary schooling.

Crediton, Tiverton and Exeter are all readily accessible, yet from the house the outlook is wonderfully rural, across neighbouring orchards and down the valley towards the rooftops of Cheriton Fitzpaine and Raddon Top beyond.

The entrance gives you the first real clue as to what is ahead. It's a welcoming yet practical space, flooded with natural light, with broad central oak steps rising between exposed stone walls into the main living area beyond. And what a room it is. Extending to almost 13 metres in length, the vaulted kitchen, dining and living space brings together the barn's original stonework with an impressive new oak frame and roof trusses, rooflights and an extraordinary run of glazing overlooking the sheltered courtyard. Rather than feeling like one enormous room, it naturally divides into places to cook, eat and relax, with a fireplace and wood-burning stove at one end and a beautiful bespoke kitchen, designed by local kitchen specialists Lowe & Bespoke, with a substantial island at the other. Behind it, the separate back kitchen is far more than an overflow space, with its own sink, dishwasher, open pantry shelving and room for two full-size fridge freezers, together with a hatch giving access to useful loft storage. There are three bedrooms, with the generous principal bedroom enjoying its own en-suite shower room and direct access outside. A second double is served by the family bathroom, while the third is currently arranged as a snug/home office but works equally well as a bedroom. A separate utility room completes a layout that is both impressive and extremely practical. And because the conversion was completed only around five years ago, there's reassurance behind all that character too. The building is highly insulated, with modern electrics and plumbing throughout, while zoned underfloor heating is supplied by an external oil-fired boiler.

It combines the atmosphere and craftsmanship you want from a barn conversion with the comfort and infrastructure of a much more modern home.

Outside is every bit as considered. The original walled garden creates a wonderful approach to the house, beautifully planted with lawns, graveled paths and several places to sit, including sheltered areas positioned to catch the last of the evening sun. On the opposite side, the long wall of glass opens from the living space into a wonderfully private courtyard, making it a natural extension of the house for summer dining and entertaining. An arched gateway leads through to the more productive gardens, with vegetable beds, greenhouse, lawns and a useful detached workshop/store, while there is ample parking close to the house with two graveled areas for parking so plenty of room for guests too and the storing of a trailer or caravan. Beyond, the paddock extends to approximately 0.8 acres and is level, well drained and fenced. The current owners allow it to grow as a wild meadow through the summer, cutting pathways through the grass before a local farmer takes a hay crop later in the year, although it could of course be used very differently by its next owner. In all, the property extends to approximately 1.5 acres, giving The Linhay a combination that's difficult to replicate: a genuinely individual home, beautifully executed, with privacy, land and one of those driveways that makes coming home feel rather special.
