the 1990s, the number of people in the UK with a mental health problem has increased by 50% (Mental Health Foundation 2000). The prevalence of mental health problems in the UK is estimated to be 16% (Mental Health Foundation 2000).

There is a growing awareness of the need to address the needs of people with mental health problems. The UK government has set out a strategy for mental health care (Department of Health 1999). The strategy aims to improve the lives of people with mental health problems by providing them with the best possible care and support. The strategy also aims to reduce the stigma and discrimination that people with mental health problems often experience.

One of the key challenges in mental health care is how to provide care and support that is tailored to the needs of individual people. This is because mental health problems can affect people in different ways, and the needs of people with mental health problems can change over time. Therefore, it is important to have a system of care and support that is flexible and responsive to the needs of individual people.

One way to address this challenge is to use a system of care and support that is based on the principles of recovery. Recovery is a process that involves people with mental health problems taking control of their lives and achieving their goals. Recovery is a personal journey, and the path to recovery can be different for different people.

One of the key principles of recovery is that people with mental health problems should be given the opportunity to participate in decisions about their care and support. This means that people with mental health problems should be given the opportunity to express their views and preferences, and to be involved in decisions about their care and support.

Another key principle of recovery is that people with mental health problems should be given the opportunity to live meaningful lives. This means that people with mental health problems should be given the opportunity to engage in activities that they find meaningful and enjoyable, and to build relationships with other people.

One of the key challenges in implementing a system of care and support based on the principles of recovery is how to ensure that people with mental health problems are given the opportunity to participate in decisions about their care and support. This is because people with mental health problems often experience difficulties in expressing their views and preferences, and in being involved in decisions about their care and support.
