the 1990s, the number of people with a mental health problem has increased by 50% (Mental Health Foundation, 2000).

There is a growing awareness of the need to address the needs of people with mental health problems in the community. The Department of Health (1999) has set out a vision for the future of mental health services, which includes a focus on preventing mental health problems, supporting people with mental health problems in the community, and providing specialist services for people with severe mental health problems. The vision is based on the principles of recovery, which is a process of achieving a better quality of life, despite the presence of a mental health problem. Recovery is a personal journey, and it is important to support people in their recovery.

One of the key challenges in supporting people with mental health problems in the community is the need for a coordinated approach. This involves working together across different sectors, including health, social care, and housing. The Department of Health (1999) has identified the need for a 'joined-up' approach, which involves sharing information and resources across different sectors. This is essential for ensuring that people with mental health problems receive the support they need.

Another key challenge is the need for a focus on prevention. The Department of Health (1999) has identified the need to 'prevent mental health problems from occurring in the first place'. This involves identifying people who are at risk of developing a mental health problem and providing them with support and advice. This is essential for reducing the burden of mental health problems on the community.

Finally, there is a need for a focus on recovery. The Department of Health (1999) has identified the need to 'support people with mental health problems to achieve a better quality of life, despite the presence of a mental health problem'. This involves providing people with the support and resources they need to recover from their mental health problem. Recovery is a personal journey, and it is important to support people in their recovery.

There are a number of ways in which we can support people with mental health problems in the community. One way is to provide them with information and advice. This can help them to understand their condition and the options available to them. Another way is to provide them with support and resources. This can help them to manage their condition and improve their quality of life. Finally, we can support people in their recovery.
