A Brief History of the Old Police Station, Sedgley

The building now known as the Old Police Station in Sedgley has a rich and varied past, reflecting the evolving needs of the local community over centuries.

18th Century Origins

Originally constructed in the mid-1700s, the building first served as Sedgley's village workhouse, providing shelter and labor for the poor.

Conversion to a Police Station (1860s)

In the early 1860s, the building was repurposed into a police station, complete with holding cells and a courtroom. A lease agreement dated October 11, 1864, formalized its use by county authorities, who rented it for £60 per year.

A Century of Service

For over 100 years, the station played a central role in local law enforcement. It later became part of the West Midlands Police network, continuing to serve the community well into the modern era.

Perfectly positioned within level walking distance of Sedgley High Street, residents enjoy easy access to local shops, cafés, and excellent transport links.
