Railways End Oakfield Street
BLANDFORD FORUM

Property Description

History

Blandford Forum is a historic Georgian market town in Dorset, renowned for its elegant architecture and rich heritage. Much of the town was rebuilt following a devastating fire in 1731, resulting in the attractive, uniform buildings and wide streets seen today. Situated on the banks of the River Stour, Blandford developed as an important coaching and trading centre long before the arrival of the railway.

The town entered a new phase of growth in 1863 with the opening of its railway station, enhancing connections to the wider region. Shortly afterwards, the Railway Hotel was established on Oakfield Street in 1864, ideally positioned to serve travellers arriving in the town. For many decades, it flourished as a welcoming stop for passengers and a social hub for the local community.

Following the closure of the railway line in the 1960s, the hotel continued to operate successfully as a traditional public house for many years. The building remained an established part of the town's character until its closure in 2015.

In recent years, the property has been thoughtfully redeveloped into a select collection of apartments, blending its historic origins with modern living. Flat 10 occupies a desirable top-floor position within this development, offering a unique opportunity to reside within a building that forms part of Blandford's railway heritage.
